Infant-Death Rate Still U.S. Problem

The United States is making progress in efforts to reduce its infant mortality rate, but still much work remains to be done, according to data presented at the annual meeting of the American Public Health Association, held in New York City, earlier this week.

The conference, sponsored by the U.S. Public Health Service, is the organization's 109th annual meeting and has been held every year since 1891.

Both adults and children have been affected by infant deaths, and the conference was attended by thousands of public health professionals.

MISS TAYLOR and other mothers have been fighting for decreased infant mortality rates, and the conference was an opportunity for them to share their thoughts and experiences.

Woman's Purse Grabbed by Boy

Supplement Mary Story, 6 of 515 E. 73rd St., reported that police yesterday evening at 8:30 that she was mugged in the streets of New York City. The police told her that the mugger was a white man, but she was not sure of his name.

The police said that the mugger had been seen by a farmer, who had been at the farm at the time of the incident. The mugger was described as a white man, 5 feet 9 inches tall, with brown hair and blue eyes.

The police said that the mugger was carrying a black bag, which contained money.
